

Career Outlook and Handshakes

Weekly Report 3: 9/2 - 9/8

The human world today has hundreds of thousands of careers that can be pursued. Knowing your own interests, how they align with certain careers, and the state of the career are all important factors when deciding which career to pursue.

This past week I reflected on whether my desired career of computer science was truly the career I wanted to pursue. After evaluating my two strongest characteristics, solution-orientation and innovation, I decided that a career in the technology industry, specifically computer science was the perfect career path for me. After researching over the computer science industry in class, I was able to interpret statistical data for the career. In doing so, I was able to figure out that computer science was indeed a career worth pursuing in the future because of its bright job outlook and unparalleled growth.

However, in order to delve into the professional world of computer science, handshakes are integral for one's success. Handshakes supplement a good first impression. Equipped with this knowledge, I plan to continue to practice my handshake in order to further develop my business personality while growing as a person.

Reflecting for the future, by doing research for a career, I am now properly prepared with the knowledge to ensure my success in my career. Handshakes will also go beyond how we utilize them in this class. They will be used for several things including making new friends, finding jobs, being interviewed, and more. Collectively speaking, both handshakes and career outlook prepare me for the future and beyond.
